All through the years, I am failing.

Failing in a fine categorization.

Not able to brand you in.

You, who swim into the water,

Walk on the land,

And even sometimes, fly out to the emptiness.

But don't know, where do you belong?

Which name can be better given to you?

I am tired of being confused in finding the fitting,

Confused with all your shades.

The shades, that shadow those who beside you.

Like a poisonous sting, sometimes injecting the dullness.

As a sage upon a lofty mountain, someday, preaching the peace.

Also, again, as a half-witted clown,

Shrilling and knotting the world upside down.

One of my three walls expecting to have you on.

Having your image in my hands,

Standing and struggling in-between the echoes,

Still don't know where to place and finally picked exit.
